

INCORPORATING WATER-SAVING ACTIONS INTO LAND USE PLANNING

A growing population and expanding economy often are welcome signs of community vitality. However, rapid growth can strain increasingly limited natural resources, such as water, if that growth is not matched by thoughtful planning initiatives.

Better integration of water and land use planning is critically important for long-term water sustainability in Colorado. Improved integration can enhance the consistency between a local government's community development goals and the use of its water supplies.

Several Colorado communities already have recognized the benefits of and taken steps to increase water and land use planning integration. If you are an elected official or municipal staff member interested in learning more about the principles of water conservation and land use planning and how to do more of this in your community, you will find this workshop valuable.

Consider having multiple people from your municipality attend to maximize the effectiveness of the information shared during this event.
